Ethics in Practice in Innovative Methods

Innovation in research methods brings new ethical dilemmas. Research ethics committees can struggle to support researchers at the methodological frontiers. This afternoon event includes four expert speakers working with mobile methods, internet-based research, arts-based research and place-based research.

Ethics and walking/ mobile methods

Maggie O'Neill, University of York

There is increasing emphasis on methodologies at the boundaries of the arts and social sciences. From her long experience of using walking as an arts based method for biographical and/or participatory research, Maggie will consider the ethics and ethical implications.

Internet-based research

Callum Staff, Government Social Media Research Group

User-generated content on the internet, and new types of research that come with it, bring a new set of ethical challenges. Callum will examine how traditional ethical principles cope with this challenge, and provide practical examples of issues encountered and handled.

Arts-based research

Dawn Mannay, Cardiff University

Arts-based, visual and creative methods can be effective and ethical research tools. Dawn will explore how participants' experiences and feelings can be translated into graphic art, music and film to reframe and ethically re-represent their accounts in engaging and accessible formats.

No parachutes allowed: ethics and place-based research

Louise Sheridan, Youth/Community Work, Glasgow

Much can be learned through place-based research. Louise explores how community voices can and should be incorporated throughout the research process. Place-based research should enable communities to shape research, tell their stories and create their own histories.

Event chair:

Leila Baker, Institute for Voluntary Action Research

Join us for a glass of wine after the event

Price: SRA Members £40, non-members £60
